CONGRESS PULLS DOWN THE SHUTTERS

The country feels a good deal as Governor Cleveland expressed it once at Thanksgiving time when he said everyone would be thankful that Congress was no longer in session. So far as the late Congress and the farmers were concerned it is another case of laboring and bringing forth a mouse. There is country-wide disappointment over the failure of farm relief legislation measures. It might just as well be admitted that the Hagen bill and the various suggestions including the Fess bill—all of which died, were uneconomic measures. Their most outspoken champions acknowledged this in private, but their argument was that Congress had legislated for the bankers and the financial interests, and had favored the manufacturing East. In consequence, they demanded "as much for the farmers." It remains to be seen whether the Corn Belt States will punish the Republican party for its omission when the Fall elections are held. The West was as wrathful four years ago as it is now, and when the progressive ticket of La Follette and Wheeler was put into the field it was prophesied that many States would support these candidates as a protest against the Republican party. But the protest did not register at the polls. In the West and Middle West the voters have nearly always voted the Republican ticket straight. In the South they still take their moonshine that way, and vote the Democratic ticket straight.

What really is likely to happen will be a change in Senatorships in a half dozen States that will swing the control of the Senate to the Democrats and the "Independents," otherwise known as anti-Coolidge Republicans.

RADIO CONTROL

The compromise radio arrangement in the closing hours of Congress doubtless furnishes the essential legislation necessary for the regulating of broadcasting. There have been many attempts to surround broadcasting with sufficient protection to prevent the raising of the air by propagandists and others. Up to date the "radio trust" has furnished the best service that has gone over the air, and by so doing it has won the friendship of the public. The Bill bill for a radio commission upset all previous calculations. The President wanted to place control in the hands of Secretary Hoover. Neither plan got through Congress but an emergency resolution was accepted to tide broadcasting over until next winter.

THE PERSISTENT WALSH

While Congress was closing up Senator Walsh got through a measure that insured the continued prosecution of the naval oil leases and the tightening of the rings around the spoolers who were shown up as the bribers of a Cabinet official, and as implicated in questionable methods in securing Tappan House, Pearl Harbor, and other great oil land concessions.

UNDONE THINGS

The rivers and harbors appropriations were virtually murdered by Congress; aviation was inadequately helped; the future of Muscle Shoals was left unsettled; relief was not provided for the reclamation projects. In these and many other ways it is shown that the Sixty-ninth Congress left a greater record for the things it did not do than for the matters it actually accomplished.

IN SESSION SEVEN MONTHS

During the seven months that Congress was in session 17,412 bills were introduced and of these 753 were enacted into law. The figures show how hard it is to get a bill through, especially that class of bills which Congressmen have to introduce to please some of their insistent constituents.

ALIEN PROPERTY INQUIRY

Senators Borah of Idaho, McCall of Idaho, and McMaster of South Dakota, Republicans, and Hiram of New Mexico, and Stephens of Missouri, Democrats, have been named to investigate the seizure and appraisal of property, and the handling and sale of it, together with the sale of patents and trademarks. The relations of the Department of Justice to the business and affairs of the Alien Property Custodian will be investigated. There has long been a feeling that there was something "rotten in Denmark," and the Senate investigation is a direct outgrowth of the indictment of former Custodian Miller, and former Attorney General Daugherty. Property seized during the war was turned over so rapidly that the suspicion has always existed that considerable of it stuck in the hands of a few Government officials who were supposed to see to it that nothing of it was wanted, lost, or "swiped."

RUMFORD WOMAN DIES IN AUTO ACCIDENT

Mrs. David Batot of the Swan Road, Rumford, died in the hospital at Farmington on Tuesday of last week from injuries sustained when the car in which she was a passenger overturned early that morning. In the car were Patrolman Philip Baker and daughter of Rumford and Mrs. Batot. They were on their way to New Brunswick to spend a vacation with relatives and friends.

SUGARED POLITICS

When sugar sold at twenty pounds for a dollar at the country "department store" the consumers did not have to pay for any politics. But in recent years sugar has climbed constantly in the price scale, and there has not been a period since the entry of the United States into the World War when it has been marketed independent of politics. As far back as 1912 the cane growers and sugar beet producers fought for better tariff protection against Cuban crops. Then came the war when sugar was made a pet product of the Food Administration. Just what happened no one ever knew except that prices to consumers gradually doubled. Cuba became very rich, and then very poor. Two years ago the Tariff Commission recommended a reduction in the duty on Cuban sugar. After a good deal of deliberation the recommendation was denied by President Coolidge.

These were simply the high lights in the uneventful story of politics and sugar. That the matter is still tainted by politics is indicated by the recent statement of Tariff Commissioner Broadard who complains that he was "known around the Tariff Commission as rather an active partisan of the sugar beet interests." More than that it is claimed that he is dominated by "Chairman Marvin. Marvin, by the way, is a sort of human symbol for tariffs of the kind that trusts are made of."

MUSK OXEN

Plans are being matured in Washington to raise musk oxen in Alaska. In time they will likely exist in great numbers. Only a few years ago herds of reindeer were introduced into this territory and now they have become plentiful that their meat is being used for food, and some of it is being shipped to the western part of the United States. In the plan for musk oxen it is proposed to "demonstrate the practicality of establishing the musk oxen as a useful domestic animal in Alaska." This movement in favor of musk oxen to the reindeer bids fair to undo beef cattle in about the same proportion that the automobile has put the faithful old horse and buggy out of business.

WHITE MAIL BOXES

The Postmaster General has approved recommendations that have been before him for some time to have rural mail boxes painted white. The work is being sent out to postmasters throughout the country, and they are being asked to prevail upon patrons of the postal rural routes to spread on the white paint.

"The latch string is always out" on the door of the Church and the parsonage and the homes of the Methodist people. A young man—a stranger—said last week, "Your church is a warm cordial church." The Methodist minister has had more people visit him, in the past four years, for friendship and counsel than have come to him in other years put together. In spite of this he says, "There are men in this village and town who have never once in five years visited themselves of the power of God's spirit in their lives or the privilege of Christian worship. These same men would not live in a place where there was not a protestant church." In spite of this we say:—Our Church exists for those who are outside of it—our Church is not an end in herself—she is here to do business for the community. To stamp out sin—to cause men and women, young and old, to make for us Christ likeness and Christian character—Minister and people are here, "to burn the sinner," to have a better world than we found here—if you don't believe it you get acquainted with us and see. You hurt and hinder us by your absence, but you hurt yourself more. You had better get into the Christian program and pull with us. The Epworth Herald states:—"You cannot come people by ignoring them. Don't wish you could cut your lawn that way!" The only way we can kill our enemies is to kill them with kindness. People of "Foreign" nations have discovered that there are people who are Christ like and more who are "Christians" and the Christian is a label only. They are wise enough to go around the corner and meet by the genuine.

That is what you had better do, "old friend." Jesus says, "If you love those who love you what reward have you, sinners love to sinners." The harder thing to do is to love those who hate you and you very well. There is where you show what you are made of—your metal. No, No, No, you have to overcome. "I am sure ye have done it before." There are too many good fears. Jesus Christ like, praying people in the Bethel Methodist Church for you to lose the helpfulness, the friendship and the opportunity to do and be something eternal.

SYNOPSIS

The story opens in New York, about the middle of the Eighteenth century. Robert Ormerod, who tells the tale, is talking to Peter Corlier, chief of the traders, and man of enormous strength, when Darby McGraw, Irish bonded boy, brings news that a pirate ship is "off the hook." An old sea captain announces he has been chased by the notorious pirate, Captain Rip-Rap. The older Ormerod tells Robert the pirate is Andrew Murray, his (Robert's) great-uncle, commanding the pirate ship, the Royal James. Murray is an ardent Jacobite. Next day Robert and Darby encounter a one-legged sailor, John Silver. Robert meets a young woman from a Spanish frigate who is seeking her father, Colonel O'Donnell. Murray with a force of sailors visits the Ormerods. He announces his intention of carrying off Robert, by force, if necessary, promising him a great future. Robert meets a blind sailor, Pew. The fellow's blindness apparently troubles him little, but Robert instinctively dislikes and fears him.

CHAPTER VI—Continued

"Nor will you, nephew Robert. No, my problems are connected with the difficult task of attaining an imaginary spot in this trackless waste, and puzzlement as to whether I have correctly estimated an equation of human values. You are not, perhaps, mathematical? Ah, too bad! There is no mental exercise so restful and diverting to the mind as algebra. But figures lack the warm interest of human equations. As, for instance, the exact degree of trust to be imposed in untrustworthy persons."

"Still hot" shouted the lookout in the main crossrees.

Murray's calm face flushed with sudden emotion, and he took a step forward.

"Where does she lie?" he trumpeted through his clasped hands.

"Maybe one, two points to leeward, sir."

"Can you make her out?"

"Only tops'ls, sir; big 'uns."

"Let me know as soon as you make her," said Murray, and turned back to me.

But almost at once the other lookout in the fore-castle sang out—

"Second sail to leeward, sir, comin' up arter 'otter chaps!"

Murray rubbed his hands together with every evidence of satisfaction.

"Ah!" he exclaimed. "It appears that my estimation of the safe degree of trust to be imposed in the given situation was within the bounds of accuracy."

"I don't understand you."

"No! In plain English let us say then that my own vessel and consort are meeting me according to plan."

"Why do you speak of trust?" I challenged. "Cannot you trust your own people?"

"I trust nobody farther than I must," he retorted.

And without another word he produced a patent folding spyglass from his pocket and clapped it to his eye.

Silver, who had been an interested witness to the scene from his aerial stop of the cabin skylight, hopped across the deck to my great-uncle's side.

"Beggin' your pardon, captain," he said. "But I'd make oath that tops'ls in the canvas you took out of the mizzen's ship off Pondicherry. Mind it, sir? 'Twas uncommon bleached and looked whiter'n our cloth."

Murray handed him the glass.

"Stop me, Silver, but I believe you are right," he returned. "What a hawk's eye you must have! Here, see what you can make of it with this."

Long John peered through the glass, standing his crutch against the butt of the mizzen.

"Age, 'tis—"

"'Tis James to leeward!" bailed the foretop.

And the main crossrees echoed, not to be outdone—

"Walrus comin' up astern o' her!"

"Tis they, never a doubt," assented Silver as he lowered the glass. "Diggin' into it they are, too, and a lusty show o' canvas to both o' them. If you was to ask me now, captain, I'd say Flint isn't willing to plow your Wake!"

My great-uncle indulged in a pinch of snuff, a mildly cynical smile upon his handsome features.

"I thank you," he acknowledged. "And now I would have the men tumble up their gear from below and make ready the boats. I shall also leave it to you, Silver, to lay the powder-train. How much have you?"

"Three casks, sir."

"Excellent. But allow us ample time to get free."

"Why do you give your orders to Silver and not to Bones?" I inquired curiously after the one-legged man had gone forward.

My great-uncle lowered his glass with a benevolent smile.

"I refuse to perceive that you have an ardent tendency," he commented. "Why do I single out Silver for orders? Ah! The reasons are quite obvious. To begin with, he is gifted with a personality which enables him to secure the accomplishment of tasks; but perhaps as important as that consideration is the parallel fact that it lies to my interest to develop the seed of dissension in the Walrus' crew. Their future contains infinite possibilities. Who knows what trifling factor may influence the dictates of fate? I am, you may say, in a minority of one among some hundreds of headstrong, wilful, intemperate men. United, they would crush me like a fly on the wall. Divided, and kept divided, they are so many instruments for the fulfilling of my desires. Wait until we are aboard the Royal James, Robert. Then you will realize what I offer you."

"I have heard much of it already," I agreed dryly.

"Anon you shall hear all," he answered. "Let us get Flint across-table from us in the James' state cabin with a beaker of rum at his elbow. Then you shall hear me talk!"

Bones came up to speak to him; and I rejoined Peter, who was glumly watching the unloading of the small boats and the rising of the sails by which they were slung overside.

As Murray nodded dismissal to Bones, Silver left us and hopped up to him.

"All set and ready below, captain," he announced.

My great-uncle cast his eye at the approaching ships, now so near that we could make out quite distinctly the contour of their hulls, painted yellow, with a white band delimiting the ports, man-of-war fashion. The James was already beginning to take in some of her top-canvas.

"Very good, Silver," he answered. "Master Bones! You will bring the ship to and put over the boards."

There was a great flapping and banging as the brig rounded to, and with much yoh-ho-ing the boats were lowered into the water.

"You will go off first, Master Bones," ordered Murray. Kindly present my compliments to Captain Flint and say that I should like to have a word with him aboard the James at his early convenience."

Bones sullenly touched his cap and led better than half the crew into one of the two longboats the brig had carried. Murray nodded to Silver as they cast off.

"Start your train," he said shortly. "Nephew Robert, I wish you and Peter to go into the second boat. At once, please!"

Peter and I climbed clumsily down the ladder of cante nailed to the brig's hull and dropped into the bobbing longboat. Peter groaned as we crawled over the thwarts.

"Like der waves in my stomach—oop-andt down. Now I be sick, ja!"

And he was.

Presently Murray descended the brig's side with an agility which put me to shame and took his seat in the stern sheets. Darby swarmed down like a monkey and ensconced himself beside us in the bow. Silver was slung over in the bight of a rope, and the last of the crew tumbled over after him, one upon the other's heels. Our way thrust out, and we pulled rapidly toward the Royal James, wallowing in the trough of the sea, a quarter-mile away. The Walrus, foaming up under a cloud of canvas, was almost as near, and on our weather board.

Boom! The roar of an explosion behind us was as sharp as the smack of an open hand. I turned my head. So did the others. Murray was looking back, too, and the rowers rested on their oars.

A cloud of smoke jetted up from the brig's hatches. She heeled over to starboard as we watched, gave a quivering lurch and commenced to slide under by the head. We could hear the slap of the sails as they struck the waves. In two minutes she was gone.

"I Trust Nobody Further Than I Must," He Retorted.

"That was well-contrived, Silver," remarked my great-uncle. "Stealth, but you are a man of parts. Give way, lad!"

He nodded the length of the boat to me.

"I trust you perceive the significance of that, nephew Robert. A certain young man, we will say, disappears from New York. A certain brig disappears simultaneously. Some might go so far as to associate the two disappearances. Frigates put to sea in search of a certain brig—but the brig is no more."

The men at the oars laughed loudly, and I made no answer. What could I say? I felt very hopeless.

The bulwarks of the James were lined with heads and faces as we pulled under her counter and made fast, and even at that distance the complexity of her crew was apparent. I saw Portuguese, Finns, Scandinavians, French and English cheek by jowl with negroes, Moors, Indians and slant-eyed yellow men. But what impressed me the most was the absolute silence which greeted us, a silence all the more impressive because the wind carried to our ears the bedlam of shouts, cheers, oaths and imprecations with which the Walrus was receiving Bones' boat several hundred yards away.

Murray waved me to the ladder as he set foot on the first cleat.

"Up with you, Nephew! Peter also. The rest go to the Walrus."

Darby snatched at my hand as I rose.

"Whirra, whirra, but there's an ache in my heart to be parted from ye, Master Bob!" he cried. "And if we was to be plucked it do seem we might be together on the same ship!"

He made to follow me, indeed, but Silver pulled him back.

"You stays w' me, Darby," growled the one-legged man. "Blas't ye, lad, you're our good luck. Flint'll douse the ship in rum after one look at ye."

"We'll meet again, Darby," I said. "Never you fear."

He was still jabbering in a mixture of grief and joy when I climbed over the bulwark and dropped beside my great-uncle into the midst of another world.

Fore and aft from poop to fore-castle stretched the wide deck from which the lofty spars rose like forest giants. The massive bulwarks were shoulder-high, and inboard everything was painted red exactly as in a king's ship. The hundreds of men who had watched us from the bulwarks had all slipped forward. We stood in the midst of an open space, with only three others.

One of these three was a very small old man with wispy gray hair and deeply bronzed face, from which his eyes peered intensely blue and childishly simple. He had gold rings in his ears, and his dress was neat and plain.

"My service, captain," he greeted Murray. "Ship's in order, I hope. — My eyes if we've had so much as a — of genuine wind since the — lussy bore away from ye off the Hook."

The effect of the unspeakable blasphemies which poured with mild intonation from his lips was ridiculous, but nobody appeared to notice it, and I learned afterward that his habit of swearing by the anatomy of the twelve apostles and various saints and sacred figures was the quintessence of several quaint characteristics of an unusual personality.

"We won't complain about that, Master Martin," replied my great-uncle. "I have brought back my grand-nephew to be the minister of my age."

Here he is—Master Ormerod Martin. Ah, and this is a friend of his and an old enemy of mine, Peter Corlier. As Peter rolled over the top of the bulwarks, "He is more to be reckoned with than you might suppose, is Peter."

"Master Martin, Nephew Robert, is my mate, and as such, my right hand and arm."

Martin stepped back, and the second of the three men confronting us touched his cap. This was a square, heavy-built fellow with a downy glint to his eye, who wore a decent blue cloth coat and small clothes.

"And here is Saunders, Master Martin's second," continued my great-uncle. "A Scot like myself. My nephew should make a fine Scotsman; eh, Saunders?"

"It's a brave-looking ladde in seemin'," Saunders agreed cautiously. "Your meaning is that we must prove a him?" responded Murray.

"Quite true. We shall. Ho!a, Captain!"

And he rattled into a string of French which I could not follow as the third man met him with a bow and a salute of one foot. "Poupeau was as brutal in looks and manner as Black Dog or Bill Bones, but without the sinister implications of speech and action that made me shudder whenever the blind man drew approached me or spoke in my hearing. He had been branded on the cheek, and had been branded by the brand—or perhaps 'twas the superimposed scar of a wound—had made that side of his face a very nightmare. His white and forehead showed gouges that wound upward like snakes and suggested what other torments his gaudy clothing concealed."

"Poupeau," remarked my great-uncle, turning again to me, "is our gunner. I saved him from the French galley, and he is not without devotion thence by self-interest which is to be preferred above all."

"And now we will go aft and prepare to receive Captain Flint."

Murray led us to a door in the break of the poop which was opened for us by a stalwart black in a red liver coat, who ushered us along a companionway lined with stateroom doors into a spacious state cabin stretching the width of the stern. The walls were paneled in mahogany; silver pendants were fastened at intervals, and a wondrous tower chandelier was radiant from the ceiling, itself unconsciously lofty for shipboard; several paintings in the French school hung at the sides; and there were trophies of peculiar arms and armor. Underfoot were Eastern rugs, thick piled and soft of hue.

My great-uncle surveyed this magnificence with pardonable pride. "Twas evident it meant something to him."

"Diomedes," he said to the negro, "where is Master Gunn?"

A high, piping voice answered him from the companionway.

"Coming, worshipful sir. Ben Gunn's a-coming. I jest stopped by the galley to fetch up your chocolate."

The man who followed the voice trotted in bearing a silver pitcher of steaming chocolate, Murray's favorite drink; aye, and food. He was a slender fellow, with a simple, open face, clad in plain black as became an upper servant. He stopped dead at sight of us.

"Set your tray on the table, Gunn," instructed my great-uncle. This is my grand-nephew, Master Ormerod, and his friend, Master Corlier. They are to sail with us a while."

Gunn pulled his forelock and ducked. "Servant, gentlemen," he acknowledged. "Alas glad to please, is Ben Gunn. Bound to oblige ye, gentlemen. You jest name your drinks, and I'll fetch 'em up from the wine-bins."

"Food as well, Gunn," said Murray. "And Captain Flint is coming aboard."

Ben Gunn cocked his head one side. "That means rum," he corrected. "Plenty o' rum, says you. Jest leave it to Ben, captain."

He ducked and scraped again and slipped off into the companionway with a kind of wiggle like a self-conscious child.

"My steward," remarked my relative. "The man is a half-wit, is he not?"

"A natural, yes," assented Murray, tasting the chocolate.

"I should think it would be dangerous to have one so simple in such close proximity to you."

My great-uncle smiled.

"You are quite, quite wrong, my boy. It is for the very reason that the man is incapable of spying that I use him. He is more valuable for my purposes than the most intelligent member of the crew."

He broke off.

"This chocolate is by no means so well brewed as Silver's. An extraordinary fellow, that, monstrously clever — exactly the sort of man, Robert, I never permit to remain near me. Indeed, if you possess the patience and the interest to analyze the composition of my officers and crew you will observe, I believe, that there is not an independently clever man amongst them. Aye, and if you find me a clever man aboard the Royal James — yourself and friend Peter excepted, of course — I will thank you to point him out to me, and I will straightway make a present of him to Flint, who must have half a dozen of the Walrus crew who esteem themselves equally capable with him of commanding her."

"I am not — by necessity I am not — regarded with affection by my followers. And on the whole, I think I have gotten along better by means of fear than I might have by means of affection. Fear is a natural element in a pirate's career. What place has he in his life for affection? Hark! Do I hear something?"

He did beyond question — an uproar of curses and shouts upon the deck outside.

"It is only that Captain Flint has come aboard. Pray take your seats. I promise you an interesting episode."

The door to the deck banged open, and a harsh, dominating voice belted in the companionway.

"— me, Martin, what the — d'ye think ye are? By the h— helled swab, ye made us —"

"Stow that, ye —" apologized for a — — — interrupted Martin mildly from the deck. "Why, any — would be had more sense than you!"

"Like —" I'm my own master, I am."

"Ye may be when ye stand on the Walrus' deck, but here ye're only another — — — as doesn't know better'n to veer after —"

"Poupeau for a — — — lucky, ye slab faced chunk o' rotted sea-horse! I'll talk to your master!"

Slam went the door, and a matter of curses tumbled from the companionway, preceding a tall, blue-jowled man in a flaming red coat all covered over with gold lace. He halted in the cabin in front of his hips, feet planted wide, chestnut green eyes flickering balefully on either side of a long nose that seemed to poke out from a tangle of black hair.

"Hark, eh, Murray?" he snarled. "Two men the richer for your effort. But he, 'twas a fool's errand!"

"Pardon me," objected Murray, "but I am considerably more than two men the richer in consequence of my own actions — although I would not appear by these words to depreciate the importance to be attached to the acquisition of my grand-nephew and Master Corlier. Permit me, Captain Flint! Master Ormerod, my grand-nephew, and Peter Corlier."

Flint made a patent attempt to store him down, but abandoned the effort and looked away.

"Some might say one thing and some another," he muttered.

"To whom do you owe your present position?" he asked coolly.

Flint made a patent attempt to store him down, but abandoned the effort and looked away.

"Some might say one thing and some another," he muttered.

"To whom do you owe your present position, Flint?" repeated Murray.

"Oh, to you, most like," admitted Flint. "Most you!"

"Have I ever led you into difficulties?" continued my great-uncle.

"Not I —"

"Have I ever led you into difficulties?"

"No."

"No."

"No."

"No."

"No."

"No."

"No."

"No."

"No."

"No."

"No."

Flint growled at us, flinging himself into a chair at the opposite end of the table from my great-uncle.

"A youth and a fat man!" he ejaculated. "And unwilling at that, so Bones tells me."

"Master Bones was correct in that statement," my great-uncle assented cheerfully; "but I fancy he neglected to add that the 'fat man' took his knife away from him and must have hanged him had I not intervened."

An appreciable degree of respect dawned in Flint's eyes.

"There is no butter-tub if he beated Bill!" conceded the Walrus captain.

"Curse me, though, if I see why you should add a cub to your crew."

"Tut, tut, captain," remonstrated Murray. "A cub! Think again. The boy is my help."

"All he'll fall heir to will be the rope that hung you," returned Flint. "But I'll own I did you wrong when I accused you of being but two men the better by your shore expedition. I was forgetting the red-headed man cot John Silver fetched aboard. 'Tis the first promise o' luck we've had!"

My uncle took snuff with much delicacy and rang a silver bell in front of him.

"Gunn is late with the liquor. I must ask your indulgence, captain, for compelling you to talk dry."

Ben Gunn bustled into the cabin and deposited a trayful of decanters, bottles and flasks before us. Captain Flint, without awaiting an invitation, seized upon an earthen receptacle labeled "Godney's Jammelon Rum," asked the cork with the point of a knife, tilted it to his mouth and drained a mighty dram. Then he set it down beside him, wiped his mouth on his coat-cuff and cleared his throat.

I pushed a cut-glass carafe of water toward him, supposing he would wish some dilution, and he laughed jarringly.

"You ha' much to learn, my lad," he jeered. "We don't spoil good rum w' water aboard the Walrus. There's a cask broached this minute on the spar-deck, and all hands fillin' their punnkins as fast as they can empty 'em, w' red-headed Darby astride the butt for luck."
